CAMELLIA JAPONICA

The "Queen of the Garden" blooms from early September through the month of March. By selecting early, mid-season, and late bloomers for your plantings, you can enjoy the wide range of forms and colors throughout the bleak winter months when the garden is ordinarily bare.

Camellias lend themselves well to foundation planting, as accents or highlights of the garden and may also be used as hedges.

Camellias can be grown in almost any type soil, but thrive in well-drained, slightly acid soil. Camellias are surface feeders and therefore must be planted shallow, the top of the ball should be about 1½ inches above the surrounding soil, this will allow for any future settling. Cover the ball with 1 inch of Peat Moss, or 2 inches of oak leaves or pine straw. Keep the soil moist, but never soggy.

Camellias should be given a light application of Azalea-Camellia fertilizer in March and again in June. Spray for scale in the spring, after all danger of frost has passed, with oil emulsion spray, using 1 part Volck to 50 parts water.

For your efforts with Camellias, you will be rewarded with vigorous plants and lovely blooms that will be a joy to you for years to come.

We can offer both own root and grafted Camellias. The own root plants are grown from cuttings of like varieties, the root system is slower in development and the plant not quite as energetic as a graft. Own roots do not bloom as young as grafts. Our understock of grafted Camellias is from five to twelve years old, of course, with a root system of this age, the top will grow rapidly, until it is in balance with the root system. We recommend very highly the grafted plants, with the more vigorous growth, they become more resistant to disease.

On the following pages, we have listed our Camellias as to color classification, rather than grouping them according to their degree of rarity. We think you will find it more convenient in planning additions to your garden.

AZALEAS

Azaleas are probably the most popular of blooming evergreens in the South. The blooming period is long, if different varieties are selected, your garden can be a mass of bloom for all spring. Azaleas are not hard to grow, if they are planted properly, in a likely location, they will bloom profusely with little attention.

Like Camellias, they require acid, well drained soil. They are surface feeders, and should be planted shallow with the ball slightly above surrounding soil. The soil should be kept moist during dry weather, but Azaleas do not like wet feet.

Azaleas will thrive in either partial shade or full sun, but should be mulched with peat moss, oak leaves, or pine straw to prevent roots from burning. They should be fertilized lightly in March, and again in June, with Azalea-Camellia fertilizer.

We have several types of Azaleas to offer as follows:
